THE HIGHER PRICE OF GASOLINE

The announcement of the Standard Oil company yesterday of a raise of from a half cent to a cent a gallon in the price of gasoline will not have a tendency to still the clamor for the passage of the denaturalized alcohol bill. Nor will the reason given by the Standard for the raise, an increased demand caused by the growing use of automobiles, meet the principal argument of the automobile makers in favor of the passage of the bill.

But, however great the demand may be it certainly does not increase the cost of production warranting a raise of more than twelve and a half per cent. If the gasoline making industry was a competitive business, an increased price under the conditions set forth might be expected, the competitors availing themselves of an opportunity to make up losses incurred in periods of previous sharp competition.

But the Standard Oil company has the whole business in its own hands. It is at all times able to sell at a fair profit. The raise therefore at this time is in the nature of a hold-up like that frequently practiced by an unscrupulous village grocer who may find himself in possession of the whole supply of some one commodity.

The denaturalized alcohol bill proposes to supply competition and prevent the recurrence of such conditions as this one which the Standard Oil complains, forces it to extort still greater profit from consumers.

The only argument against the denaturalized alcohol bill, aside from that of the wood alcohol refiners, of discrimination against them, is that absurd one that it would result in greater drunkenness. That is the Standard Oil's argument. In the first place denaturalized alcohol is alcohol rendered unfit for a beverage. It being a liquid it could of course be drunk but it is unlikely that the same man would drink of it often.

Those who are bent on drinking sometimes drink strange things in the absence of something better. For instance at Roosevelt when liquor was interdicted at that camp a year ago there was a surprising consumption of red ink for a time, it having been made known that the solvent of the aniline was alcohol. Worcestershire and kindred sauces are frequently drunk for their intoxicating effect, but there is little danger of one forming the red ink or the Worcestershire sauce habit.

As to the argument of the wood alcohol refiners that the bill is unfair to them they should be reminded that laws are or ought to be framed for the good of the greatest number.

A TOO DETAILED DENIAL.

In his quarrel with former Senator Chandler and Senator Tillman, President Roosevelt is paying the penalty of neglect of a well known newspaper rule evolved in the controversial period of journalism, "Assail in a column and deny in a line."

Mr. Roosevelt's denial was too comprehensive. It included too many things that were not essential. The pertinent accusations against him were that he had broken faith with his democratic allies after having maligned leading republican senators.

It would have been enough to deny that in his conversation with Mr. Chandler he had assailed the motives of Messrs. Knox, Spooner and Foraker or that he had pledged himself to any particular amendment. That would have covered the whole ground of controversy and presented an insoluble question of veracity between him and Mr. Chandler.

But when he denied the irrelevant assertion that he had not sent for Mr. Chandler, there was left in the hands of the latter the letter of Mr. Loeb written at the request of the president urging his attendance at the White House and when he denied that he had made any overtures to Senator Tillman but stated that the senator had sought his aid, there must have been forgotten the conferences of Attorney General Moody and Senators Tillman and Bailey undertaken at the request of the president. There too was the consistent attitude of Mr. Tillman toward the president almost precluding the notion that the South Carolina senator would seek Mr. Roosevelt for any purpose.

Thus the president has manufactured by his too detailed denial a great deal of adverse circumstantial evidence.

As Mr. Chandler in his statement of yesterday said, the situation is of "no importance in itself," but when eminent gentlemen apply to each other the words "false and malicious liar" a certain interest attaches to the dispute.
